Introduction

In today's context of globalization, the issue of national values is becoming increasingly relevant as one of the vital factors of societal development. Each nation's identity, historical heritage, customs, and traditions are manifested through its national values. For this reason, the philosophical and social analysis of the concept of national value and a deep understanding of its essence are of great scientific importance.

National values are one of the main factors shaping a person's worldview, moral views, and social behavior. They serve to ensure social stability in society, preserve the continuity between generations, and continue the spiritual heritage. In particular, the role of national values in the upbringing of the younger generation is incomparable, through which feelings of patriotism, national pride, and social responsibility are formed in a person.

From a philosophical perspective, national values develop in close connection with the common values of humanity. On the one hand, they reflect national characteristics, and on the other, they harmonize with universal human values. From a social perspective, national values manifest as an important factor regulating the cultural development of society, the system of social relations, and cooperation between people.

Currently, the rapid development of information technologies and the widespread spread of global culture have a diverse impact on national values. This necessitates their preservation, development, and improvement in accordance with modern conditions.

The purpose of this article is to analyze the concept of national value from a philosophical and social perspective, revealing its role and significance in the life of society.

Literature analysis and methodology

The concept of national value is a complex and multifaceted category studied at the intersection of philosophy, sociology, cultural studies, and pedagogy. In scientific literature, national values are analyzed in close connection with the historical development of society, its cultural heritage, and the system of social relations.

In philosophical sources, the concept of value is interpreted as a social phenomenon closely linked to human activity, needs, and interests. In it, values are viewed as a set of material and spiritual values created by humanity. National values, in turn, are interpreted as a unique manifestation of these common values, formed on the basis of the life, customs, traditions, and historical experience of a specific people.

In social research, national values are evaluated as a factor that ensures social stability, strengthens social cohesion, and plays a crucial role in the process of an individual's socialization. Furthermore, through national values, continuity between generations is ensured, and cultural heritage is preserved and developed.

In domestic scientific sources, the issue of national values is covered more in connection with spirituality, the national idea, cultural heritage, and upbringing. These studies emphasize the need to instill national values into the minds of the younger generation and to preserve and develop them in the context of globalization.

In modern scientific views, the transformation of national values—that is, their adaptation to a changing social environment—also occupies an important place. It is noted that the content and form of national values are changing under the influence of global cultural and information flows.

A number of methods based on a comprehensive scientific approach were used in the implementation of this research. These methods served to deeply study the concept of national value from a philosophical and social perspective.

Using the method of analysis and synthesis, existing scientific literature on national values, their essence, and their role in society was studied and summarized. Through this, various theoretical views were brought into a single system.

The stages of formation and development of national values were analyzed based on the historical approach method. This method helped identify the historical roots of national values and understand their evolution.

Through the comparison method, national and universal human values were compared, and their similarities and differences were identified. This made it possible to determine the place of national values in the general system of values.

Based on the observation method, the practical manifestation of social processes, behavior, and values in society was studied. This method served to connect theoretical views with the practical situation.

The generalization method became the primary tool for systematizing the results obtained during the study and drawing scientific conclusions.

As a result, the methodological approach used made it possible to comprehensively illuminate the concept of national value from a philosophical and social point of view.

Results and discussion

The research results demonstrated that national values are a significant social phenomenon forming the spiritual foundation of society, playing a decisive role in shaping an individual's worldview, moral norms, and social behavior. The existence and development of national values serve to ensure social stability in society, foster national identity, and maintain the continuity between generations.

As a result of the analysis, the main characteristics of national values were identified. In particular, they are characterized by aspects such as historicity, continuity, stability, and adaptability. While national values, on the one hand, preserve their traditional content, on the other hand, they are renewed under the influence of modern social processes. This indicates that they are dynamic in nature.

Additionally, the study emphasized the role of national values in the socialization of the individual. Through them, a person masters the rules of society, finds their place in social relations, and realizes their national identity. Especially in the spiritual development of the younger generation, national values are manifested as an important educational tool.

During the discussion, the state and prospects of national values in the context of globalization were analyzed. Modern information technologies, mass culture, and global integration processes are influencing national values in various ways. On the one hand, these processes create opportunities for the broader promotion of national values, and on the other hand, they may lead to the weakening of certain elements of them.

From this perspective, there is a need to preserve national values and develop them in accordance with modern conditions. In this process, the interaction between the education system, the family, and social institutions is of great importance.

In general, the results obtained once again confirm that national values are an important factor in the development of society and the need for their in-depth study and development.

Conclusion

In conclusion, it can be said that national values are one of the main factors determining the spiritual life of society and playing an important role in the social and moral formation of the individual. They are formed based on historical experience, cultural heritage, and social relations, are passed down from generation to generation, and serve to ensure the stability of society.

The research findings demonstrated that national values act as a vital criterion regulating an individual's worldview, behavior, and social activity. Through them, a person realizes their national identity, determines their place in society, and actively adapts to social life.

At the same time, globalization and the expansion of the digital environment place new demands on national values. This process, along with the enrichment of their content, can also lead to the weakening of some aspects. Therefore, developing national values in accordance with modern conditions, instilling them in the minds of the younger generation, and preserving them remains an urgent task.
